

Choosing a name for the little girl-to-be is a fun, yet sometimes daunting task. These days it seems that popular girls' names change much more from year to year than boys' names do. And the popularity of a particular name varies a lot from state to state depending on the cultural background of the state's citizens. Just take a look at these 2006 survey results.

Most Popular Baby Girls Names of 2006

Did you know that the social security administration keeps a running tally of the most popular names given to new baby girls each year? When the proud parents apply for a social security number for their new little one, the SSA puts it in their database. Each year they release a list of the most popular names across the United States and they even break it down into most popular names state by state. If you want to see where you or your child's name ranked on this year's list, just visit the Social Security website.

In 2006, the top 10 U.S. baby girl's names in order of popularity were Emily, Emma, Madison, Isabella, Ava, Abigail, Olivia, Hannah, Sophia and Samantha. If you had twin girls in 2006, you likely went with one of the top names for twin girls handed out in the U.S. – Ella & Emma, Madison & Morgan, Gabriella & Isabella, or Faith & Hope.

Of course, the popularity of given names varies by state as cultural background and ethnicity play significant roles in the baby name selection process. Take the name Mia for instance, it was the #1 most popular girl's name in Arizona and the 4th most popular name given to girls in California. However, Mia ranked 13th overall in the U.S. In Minnesota, Montana and South Dakota, the name Grace ranked in the top 5 while it ranked 17th overall in the U.S.
